Work and cancer

About this easy read booklet

This booklet is about what happens if you are working and you have cancer.

You can learn about what may happen at work when you have cancer.

If you are worried about your health, you should talk to a doctor or nurse.

Work and cancer

Having cancer can mean that you will not be able to do the things you used to do every day.

This can be because you are feeling ill. Or it can be because you are tired from the treatments for cancer.

It can be because you need time to go to the hospital for your cancer care.

You may want to keep working when you have your cancer treatment. Or you may want to take time off work for your treatment and for a while after.

If you want to, it can be a good idea to tell your work about the cancer and your treatment. It is your choice what you share.

If you choose to tell your employer that you have cancer, there are things they must do to help you keep your job. These things are called reasonable adjustments.

A reasonable adjustment might mean:

- having time off work to go to hospital

- working different hours

- having extra breaks from things that are hard or tiring.

Your employer can not tell you to quit your job because you have cancer. They must try to help you with reasonable adjustments first.

Sometimes reasonable adjustments do not help enough. This might be because the job is too hard to do when you are feeling ill. Or you might feel too ill to do any job.

You can get help with money if you have cancer and you can not work.

You should be able to get 'sick pay' from your employer, even if you work part time.

You may also be able to get benefits.

Benefits are a type of money paid by the government. They are for people who need help with the cost of living.

You can learn more about benefits from our booklet Claiming benefits when you have cancer.

There are people at Macmillan you can talk to about work and cancer. They are called the Work Support Service.

You can talk to the Work Support Service by calling the Macmillan Support Line on 0808 808 00 00. You can talk to them Monday to Friday, 8am to 6pm.
