Complementary therapies

About this easy read booklet

This booklet is about complementary therapies that might make you feel better.

You can learn about the different complementary therapies you might be able to have.

If you are worried about your health, you should talk to a doctor or nurse.

Complementary therapies

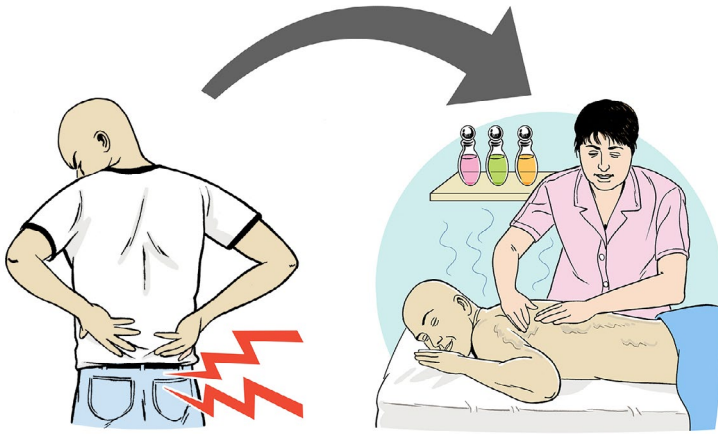

Complementary therapies do not treat cancer. But they may make you feel better while you have cancer treatments.

They may help you feel more relaxed and less stressed.

Feeling stressed is when your mind and body feel bad because you are worrying about something.

Some people find that complementary therapies help them with their cancer symptoms and side effects.

Symptoms are signs in your body that tell you something is wrong, like feeling tired all the time.

Side effects are unwanted effects caused by having treatment, like tiredness or feeling sick.

There are lots of different complementary therapies. Here are some complementary therapies that some people find helpful:

Aromatherapy massage

This is being massaged with oils that smell nice. Some people find this relaxing.

Reflexology

This is massaging your hands and feet. Some people find it helps them feel relaxed.

Relaxation techniques

These are things you can do to make yourself feel calm and make your muscles feel relaxed.

Some people find this helps them feel less stressed.

Some relaxation techniques you could try:

Breathing exercises

This is where you take slow deep breaths.

Muscle relaxation

This is when you tense and then relax your muscles.

Guided imagery

This is where you think about happy things instead of sad or scary things.

Before you have any complementary therapies, ask your doctor or nurse. They can tell you if it is safe for you to have it.

Before you have a complementary therapy, tell the therapist you have cancer. This can change the treatment or advice they give you.
